OCR-B After evaluating existing OCR designs, it was decided to develop OCR-B is a monospace font developed in 1968 by Adrian Frutiger for Monotype by following the European Computer Manufacturer's Association standard. Its function was to facilitate the optical character recognition operations by specific electronic devices, originally for financial and bank-oriented uses. It is widely used for the human readable digits in UPC/EAN barcodes. It follows the ISO 1073-2:1976 (E) standard, refined in 1979 ("letterpress" design, size I). It is also used for machine-readable passports. It includes all ASCII symbols, and other symbols needed in the bank environment. (ECMA) started standardization activities related to Optical Character Recognition (OCR). It shares that purpose with OCR-A, but it is easier for the human eye and brain to read and it has a less technical look than OCR-A. It was accepted as the world standard in 1973 0b98723483
